The clearer this is pass through it without losing their spend the day. heat. Obviously, the cloudier or thicker the air the more the sun rays will be absorbed.

Conversely, on the brightest nights the earth will lose the most heat from radiation, and, becoming colder than the atmosphere, moisture from this will be deposited in the form of dew.

In the younger days of the earth, when the seas were boiling hot, and perhaps for millions of years afterward while they were gradually growing cooler, there must have been an atmosphere so surcharged with steam as to prevent completely the passage inward of any heat rays, or outward radiation. As a necessary consequence of these conditions there is supposed to have been one uniformly hot temperature all over the earth, there being no difference between what are now the tropics and the arctic regions.

When the temperature had fallen sufficiently to allow the development of the gigantic ferns that were to form our coal deposits, things grew as luxuriously in what we now call the temperate and arctic zones as at the equator. Consequently, there was nothing very surprising at the distant from the south pole.
